ingure 25 will be found useful for sawing curved lines of all kinds. The saw, unlike the hand saw, is intended to cut in any direction of the grain of the wood, and for this reason the shape of the teeth should be like that of the rip saw, the front of the tooth being filed at an angle of 60 to 70 degrees to the side of the cut the same the angle smally being be-

BOW SAW.

A more important saw than the compass saw for cutting curves of every description is the small bow saw, illustrated n figure 26. The blades are interchangable, and should be ten inches long, and the width should be three-sixteenthis, one-quarter or three-eighths inch, as required for different curves. The handle turns in the frame so as to present the cutting edge of the saw in any direction required by the curves being sawed. Do not hold the saw while using by gripning the frame of the saw in one hand and the handle in the other, but grip the saw handle only, next to the operator, with both hands, one hand over the other, steadying the frame with the tips of the fingers only, while holding on to the handle with the hands.

To saw an inside curve or opening,

The pin is replaced through frame and the end of the blade, the is tightened, and the sawing pro-the same as on an outside curve. the cut is finished the saw is wed from the opening in the same sawing out stock of any kind, straight or curved, up to three inches in thickness. Among the different tools of the woodworker none fills a more important place than the plane. The iron planes, one of which is libistrated in Figure 28, are greatly to be preferred to the old-style wooden plane of former days. These iron planes can be bought in many sizes and a tvery moderate prices. They all work on the same principle, and the adjustments are very nearly the same for all. To a better understanding of their construction and of their different parts, we show in Figure 22 a plane with one side removed. In which is a thin blade of cast sited of equal thickness throughout, and in new planes it is already ground and sharpened for immediate use. The capiron is fastened to the cutting iron by the adjusting screw, as shown in Figure 30. The office of this cap, which is not sharp, is not, as is sometimes explained, for the purpose of stiffening or strengthening the cutting iron, but is to serve as a chip break, to prevent the cutting edge of the plane iron from tearing and a chip break, to prevent the cutting edge of the plane from from tearing and breaking the grain of the wood below the surface of the piece, whenever the grain turns and twists or runs downward be-

In such cases, and indeed for all crossgrained woods, such as quartered oak, quartered sycannore, mahogany or other wood which is hard to smooth, this cupiron is ecrewed on with its dull edge cutting edge of the plane fron is The cutting edge of the plane from is said to have "lead" in proportion to the distance it is placed in advance of the doll edge of the cap from and for soft, straight-grained wood the lead may be one-thirty-second of an inch or even more, but this distance must be reduced in proportion as the grain is curly, crooked or knotty. The iron lever C (Faura 29) is held in place below its center by the seriew G, which acts as a fulcrum, and the lever is clumped down upon the cutter by the cam place D.

ter by the cam place D. When the cam is thrown up the leve C and the cutting from may be removed without changing the screw G, the adjustment of which should not be changed except in case the cam does not press hard enough to keep the plane from slipping out of adjustment, in which case hard enough to keep the plane iron from slipping oil of adjustment, in which case the pressure can be increased by tightening the screw G. The use of the brass simunb screw B is to draw or drive the plane iron, and thus regulate the thickness of the sharings to be taken from the surface of the wood. By the use of the like surface of the wood, By the use of the content of the corners of the corners of the corners of the cutting edge from forming grooves and ridges on the surface complete the distribution of the corners of the corners of the cutting edge from need sharpening remove it from the plane, loosen the adjusting screw which connects it with the cap from but do not take the cap from off, slip it back to the extreme end of the slot, and grain tight enter the adjusting screw.

The cap from will, in this position, serve as a convenient handle, or rest, in whetting or even in grinding fit necessary. All whetting and grinding must be done on the beyled side only, the upper side being kept as flat and smooth as possible so as to scource easy working. Having sharpened the plane and sites eigninging a down in its place turn the plane up and fook down ofter the face from the front end of the plane and of the cannel of the plane and the exact.

ectly over that corner. This will beginner that the cutting edge of the iron is rounding, and if the plane is held so that the middle of the cutting edge of the is rounding, and if the plane is held so that the middle of the cutting edge of this plane from will do the cutting, the shawing planed from the edge will be of the same thickness on both of its edges, and the surface of the edge of the board with regard to the face side will romain unchanged, but if the plane is puebed over to one side—either to the right or to the loft side—the shaving will be very thin, or feather-edged, on one edge and of the full thickness which the plane is adjusted to cut on the other, thus reducing the higher corner of the edge and bringing it by the thickness of one shaving nearer square with the face of the beard at every stroke of the plane.

The operator's postion while planing should be one of perfect ease, standing well back of the place to be planed and pushing the plane steadily forward to arm's length from (not alongside of) the operator, taking long and continuous shavings from the board. When starting the shaving at the end of the board hold the forward end of the plane down firmly or the act of pushing forward will cause that end of the plane to tilt up and the plane iron to chatter or vibrate on the surface as it begins to cut the shavend to balance it while the stroke is being started. To insure smooth work, care must be taken to plane with the grain of the wood and not against the ends of the fibers as they lie in the surface of the board.

If the fibers tear out and the board becomes rough, reverse the ends of the board so as to cut the shavings in the opposite direction, and note the difference in the effect on the planed surface. Experience will soon enable the workman to see, without trying, from which end the piece must be planed to insure a smooth surface, (Copyright 1904, by Joseph B, Bowles.)

GIRL FOUND DEAD WITH THROAT CUT

Every Evidence of Murder and No Clue to the Mur-

(By Associated Press.) MARSHALL MO., November 4.-The dead body of Miss Rosa Butts, aged twenty-three years, a white servant gir of this city, was found to-day in the suburbs of South Marshall in a pasture. The girl had evidently been murdered. Her throat had been cut with a sharp stick, a piece of which still remained in the flesh, her left ear had been cut off. and there was a bullet hole in her head. Miss Butts was last seen late Wednes day night last, with two young men, one of whom her sister can recognize, Neither of the men have been located. A man living near where the body was found, reports having heard screams on Wednesday night, but no search for the girl was started until to-day.
